

Speech on Animal Welfare and Responsibility

Dear friends,

Today, I stand before you to speak about a topic that often goes unnoticed in the fast pace of our daily lives—the well-being and rights of animals.

Across the world, millions of animals—whether domestic, wild, or farmed—live in conditions that are far from what they deserve. In our cities, stray dogs and cats roam the streets, often hungry, injured, or neglected. In rural areas, working animals like oxen, donkeys, and horses are burdened beyond their limits. In forests and natural habitats, wildlife faces constant threats from poaching, deforestation, and climate change.

The relationship between humans and animals is ancient and deeply interconnected. Animals have helped us in fields, protected our homes, offered us companionship, and enriched our ecosystems. Yet, in return, we have often failed them.

But change is happening—and we must be part of it.

From government programs promoting sterilization and vaccination of stray animals, to NGOs rescuing abused creatures, and citizens building shelters or feeding stray dogs, a quiet revolution is underway. The laws are being strengthened. Awareness is growing. More people are beginning to understand that animal welfare is not a side issue—it is a moral responsibility.

Thank you.